“ My first memory of Michael was helping to build the set for 'The Mousetrap' at Threshold. I am not a carpenter, but I managed to create what I thought was a pretty amazing and solid semicircular step around the elevated portion of the stage. Mike could not have been more appreciative and supportive of my efforts, though I suspect he tore three-quarters of my fledgeling construction down and rebuilt it properly when I left the theater at the end of the day. He was a joker, a wonderful, endearing Star Wars geek, and a genuinely fun guy who saw through the seriousness of life to God's underlying gag line. I expect the two of them are having a side-splitting conversation. Because for all the truth we actors pompously contend that we deliver, the basic truth is that we're really just making it up. Mike was real in a way that most of us will never be. Godspeed, my friend, I will always hear your laughter. And that laughter is the true voice of humanity and humility.
